PREPAREDNESS™

AWARENESS, PREPAREDNESS, RESPONSE, AND RECOVERY

On average, it takes 6-8 minutes for law enforcement to arrive on the scene of an active assailant, and by then, much of the damage has already been done.

Developing a preparedness mindset regardless of the nature of an active threat will enable action without hesitation when seconds count. Our Active Threat Readiness Training (ATR) Course is designed to provide a foundation for understanding what happens when an ordinary day turns extraordinary, and identifies the decisions that need to be made, including what to do when law enforcement arrives. Threats can occur where we work, learn, worship, serve, and play.

Awareness:

The Ability to recognize potential threats before they happen, and see risk factors that may lead to a dangerous incident or violent attack.

Preparedness: Comprehensive planning and rehearsal for threats posed by fire, natural disasters, active shooters or other instances of danger or violence.

Response: A series of actions taken by organizations and individuals in response to an ongoing active threat with the intent of saving lives and ending the threat.

Recovery: A range of actions post event including medical care, work environment changes, change in response planning, temporary relocation during restoration, and organizational and community support in the process of healing.
